CASTLE James Bryce, that observing and benevolent and wise Englishman, who spent so many years among us as his countrys representative at Washington, and who knows us Americans better than we know ourselves, --Bryce has said that the finest thing in American life is our universities. Here our youth turn aside from the work-a-day world in which they grow up, and to which they will presently return, and for a few years while the mind is vigorous and keen come in daily contact with the best products of mans thinking in all the ages that have gone before. If with such contacts our young men and young women do not themselves learn to think correctly and act wisely, it will not be for lack of opportunity to learn but rather because of failure to appreciate properly and to seize effectively the opportunities offered. That our young people do, with few exceptions, value the opportunities of college life...
